جنت jannat (or جنة jannaṭ), Paradise, heaven. Mahomet knew the genius of his countrymen too well, to suppose that they would be captivated with the idea of mere spiritual enjoyments in the world to come; he therefore declared, that as the body in this life takes so much part in the sufferings of the soul, it should in justice partake of its happiness hereafter, by the most exquisite enjoyment of every corporeal sense. A vulgar notion has prevailed, that the Arabian prophet excludes women from his paradise, but he had too high a regard for the sex to be guilty of so unpolite a piece of injustice: the idea originated from a verse in the Alcoran, which most certainly allows no place there for old women; this gave so much uneasiness to an ancient dame, that she remonstrated to Mahomet upon the cruelty of the exclusion; when the prophet rendered her immediately perfectly happy by declaring that all the old women should be restored to the bloom of youth before they entered those mansions of bliss. The Mahometans believe that there are eight heavens, or different degrees of felicity, for the blessed; and seven hells, or degrees of torment, for the damned; drawing from thence an inference, that the mercy of God surpasses his justice. جنت

جنت عدن jannat adan, The garden of Eden. The Mahometans assign three places for this terrestrial paradise: the first, near Damascus in Syria; the second, towards Obollah in the Arabian Irac or Chaldea; and the third, on a spot bordering upon the desert of Noubendijan in Persia, called Sheb Bouvan, watered by the Nilab; whilst others fix it at Samarcand. The more ancient traditions however place it in the island of Serendib or Ceylon, where they say Adam was interred; agreeable to which opinion the Portuguese have named the mountain, where they pretend to point out the grotto and sepulchre of the father of mankind, Pico d'Adam.

جنت jinnat, Demons. Insanity, fury. Junnat, A covering. Armour. A shield.

A leach, a blood-sucker. دیو آباد, Possessed by the devil, a demoniac. دیو باد, The devil's wind, a whirlwind, hurricane. The Dives, genii, or giants, in Eastern mythology, are a race of malignant beings, called likewise دیو, a male demon, (the Peris being imagined of the female sex, though both are supposed to propagate their species independent of one another, an irreconcilable enmity subsisting between them, See پری). The Persians say, that four of the principal genii made war upon Tahmuras, the third king of the Pishdadian dynasty, by whom however they were defeated, and imprisoned in frightful caverns; on which account that prince is called in history and romance دیو بند, the chainer of demons. In the Chronicle of Abujafar, there is a tradition, that God created the Genii or Dives long before Adam, and gave them the world to rule over for 7000 years: after which, the sovereignty was vested in the Peris and Dives for 2000 years more, under their sole monarch Gian ben Gian: but these beings disobeying the mandates of God, Eblis (the devil) then an ethereal angel, was sent from heaven to chastise and govern them; when, being joined by a considerable party of malecontents, he gave battle to Gian ben Gian, whom he totally routed, and became in his room absolute sovereign of the earth. Intoxicated, however, with his dignity, Eblis forgot that he was inferior to Omnipotence: to humble him, therefore, Man was created, and the proud angel commanded to obey him; but refusing, he was cursed by God, and doomed to everlasting torment. From this stubborn disobedience, it is added, he was named Iba, The Refractory; Eblis, The Desperate; and Sheitan, The Proud; his original name having been Hares, The Guardian or Protector.

‡ دیوان dīwān, A royal court. A tribunal of justice, revenue, &c. A council of state, a senate or divan. The Asiatics say, that Solomon (son of David) had a divan, in which he judged not only men, but likewise the Peris, and Genii, or Demons; over whom he exercised a despotic authority.—The Khalifs of the house of Abbas constituted a divan (called المظالم, the court of oppression), which took cognizance of all the acts of tyranny of the great men throughout the empire. The Khalifs themselves for some time presided in it; but in the reign of Moctader (about the beginning of the tenth century) a woman, according to some historians, discharged the office of president. پای دیوان or ایاک دیوان, A divan called on any popular tumult, when the sovereign must shew himself at a window to answer and redress the complaints of his subjects. دیوان

ذ

ذ dal, The ninth letter of the Arabic alphabet, denoting in arithmetic 700. In the almanacs, it is used as a contraction for the penult month, of the Arabian year ذوالتعدة; as ذ is the character for ذوالحجة, The last month. One word only in the Persian language begins with this letter (i. e. ذلام, The choleric), but in the middle of words it is sometimes confounded with د, as پدر and پدر, &c. It is also occasionally found in the middle of a Persian word, as in پذیرفتن, گذاشتن and the like. E. Its legitimate sound was perhaps somewhat like th in that; but the Persians make but little, if any difference between it and ز; to distinguish it however from ز, ذ, and ض, it is represented in this edition by z, having one dot over it. ▲ ramāṣūn (plur. ramāṣūnāt or رمضانون ramāṣūnūn), The ninth month of the Mahometan year; during which their prophet has enjoined a fast of the most rigorous kind;

all good Moslems being interdicted from eating, drinking, and conjugal duty, from the rising of the sun till the appearance of the stars; the sick, the traveller, the soldier in the field, and others, whose situation will not permit so strict an observation of it, being obliged to fast a complete month when their health and circumstances will allow. The word Ramāṣūn implies a consuming fire; whence it is by some conjectured, that this month was formerly stationary in the most sultry period of the summer, and not revolving through all the seasons, as at present, in consequence of the Mahometan year being universally lunar. The Ramāṣūn is greatly revered on many accounts, but particularly from the belief, that it was on the 27th of this month called ليلة القدر (the night of power) that the Alcoran began to descend from heaven; on the anniversary of which all orthodox Mahometans continue most fervently in prayer, imagining that every petition then put up to Omnipotence will be favourably received. Ramāṣūn is also one of the attributes of God, as the pardoner, and likewise the burner of sinners. سال شمسی, سال (plur. سالها), A year. سال, The solar year. سال قمری, The lunar year. سال سال, The solar year. سال دیگر, The next year, the year to come. Another year. سال قحط, A year barren for want of rain. The epoch of the Persian solar year is of very high antiquity, their historians and astronomers generally carrying it up to Gem or Gemshid (see جم) above 800 years before the Christian era. It consists of twelve months, of thirty days each, five days more being added to a particular month to make the number in all 365. For some time there was no embolism, similar to our leap year; in consequence of which, their Nōrōz, or new year's day originally fixed at the vernal equinox when the sun enters Aries, unavoidably made a retrograde progression into Pisces; to remedy which, at the end of every 120 years, a month was intercalated, and celebrated with the greatest festivity all over the kingdom. This month, at the end of the first period, followed Phervardin (March); at the second celebration it was placed after Ardibehisht (April); and on the third it succeeded Khرداد (May); the five ascititious days being always annexed to it. In this rotation it continued till the year 636 of the Christian era, when Yezdeghird III. the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, being defeated and dethroned by the Arabians, Persia became a province of the great empire of the Khalifs; and the Mahometan lunar computation being introduced in all civil and religious affairs, the intercalations of the solar year were, from that period, neglected, till 1079, when the Seljukian sultan of Persia, Malekshah Jellaleddin (Emiru'l'Omra (see امير) to the khalif Moktadi) reformed the kalendar, which has since borne his name; bringing forward the Nōrōz from the fifteenth degree of Pisces to the first of Aries, and intercalating an embolismal day every fourth year, which was thence called سال کيسه or leap year. The astronomers, in their tables, add the five ascititious days to the last month Isphen-darmaz (February); though they are vulgarly annexed to Aban (October), because they happened to follow that month in the intercalary rotation, at the defeat of Yezdeghird, who had made an alteration in the kalendar, known by his name, which however, in consequence of that event, soon ceased to be publicly attended to. It may here be observed, that the old Persian month was not divided into weeks, every day having a distinct name taken from the angel supposed to preside over it. See ماه سكندر siḡandar, Alexander. Two princes of this name are much celebrated in the East, (both distinguished by the title of ذو القرنين, Having two horns (of the world), implying that they conquered the globe from east to west; the first supposed to be one of their most ancient kings (See سرير الذهب); the other Alexander of Macedon, whom they call also Ben Filicos (son of Philip), and Rumi (the Grecian). Some Persian historians say, however, that he was not the son of Philip, but of Dārāb (Darius), who having married a daughter of Philip, sent her back, though pregnant, because he disliked her breath; that being delivered of Alexander at her father's court, Philip educated him as his son, and bequeathing him his crown with the secret of his birth, he laid claim to the throne of Persia, then filled by his younger brother Darius (by another mother), and supporting his pretensions with a powerful army, defeated him, and reigned as the tenth king of the Caianian dynasty; dividing his empire on his death-bed amongst twenty-four of his principal commanders, the chief of whom they call Lagos (Ptolemy). The Tārīkh-i Muntakhab relates, however, that he distributed his dominions in his life-time among the sons of those princes whom he had conquered, on the condition of their paying him homage as lord paramount, and furnishing certain quotas of troops; which terms they punctually complied with till his death, when each became independent in his feudal principality. (If there are circumstances in these Eastern details inconsistent with truth, let it be remembered, that they are not more visionary than the legendary improbable fictions which swell the Greek historians). The conquests of Alexander are celebrated in many Persian, Arabic, and Turkish histories, romances, and poems, under the titles of Sikandar nāmāh (the book of Alexander), Ainahi Iskandari (the mirror of Alexander), Bahārīs-ān (the mansion of the Spring), &c.

There is a degree of magnificence in some of the Eastern coins, together with an elegance of fancy in the inscriptions, to which the Europeans have nothing similar. A mere accident having afforded me an opportunity some time ago of making a hasty transcript of one (struck at Delhi, A. D. 1653, in the reign of the great Mogul Shah Jehan), which to me appeared to give weight to the above observation, I shall here insert a description of it, as it may to some perhaps be an object both of curiosity and information: It is of gold, and circular, above 70 ounces in weight, nearly four inches diameter, and four lines thick; in value about 300*l.* Within the circle on each side is described a square, the angles in contact with the periphery, in which, and in the complementary segments, are the following inscriptions. N. B. The coin in question measures five inches and a half. z.

1. Within the square on one side (in four lines. z.).

شہاب الدین محمد صاحب

قران ثانی شاہ جهان پادشاہ غازی. (۲۸ z.)

The bright star of religion, Muhammad, a second Sāhibi Kirān, Shāh Jahān, the victorious emperor. (Sāhibi Kirān is a royal title, similar to Cæsar, Augustus, &c. It was adopted by Tamerlane).

2. In the segment of the circle, on the upper side of the square (in two lines. z.).

سکه بر مہر دوسد مہری زد از لطف اللہ

The impression upon this coin, of 200 mohurs (see مہر) was struck by divine favour,

3. On the lateral segment to the left hand (in two lines. z.).

ثانی صاحب قران شاہ جهان دین پناہ

by the second Sāhibi Kirān, Shāh Jahān, the defender of the faith.

4. On the bottom segment (in two lines. z.).

روی زرباد از نقش سکہ اش عالم فروز

May the face of gold, from the sculpture of his coin, enlighten the world,

5. On the lateral segment to the right (in two lines. z.)

تا شود از پرتو خورشید روشن روی ماہ

as (long as) the splendid face of the moon is (illuminated) by the rays of the sun.

On the Exergue or Reverse.

1. Within the square (in five lines. z.)

لا الہ الا اللہ محمد رسول اللہ

ضرب دار الخلفہ شاہ جہان آباد ۱۰۶۲

There is no God, but God, and Mahomet is the prophet of God. Struck in the capital of Shāh-jahānābād (Delhi) A. H. 1064 (A. D. 1653).

2. On the top of the square (in two lines. z.)

شد ایمان از صدق ابی بکر انور

Religion was enlightened by the truth of Abībākar (Abubekere);

3. On the left hand compartment (in two lines. z.)

شد از عدل عمر اسلام قوی دست

The faith was strengthened by the justice of ʿamar (Omar);

4. On the bottom compartment (in two lines. z.)

از شرم و حیای عثمان دین تازه شد

Piety was refreshed by the mildness and modesty of ʿasmān (Othman);

5. On the right hand compartment (in two lines. z.)

ولایت انور در علم علی یافت

The world was illumined by the learning of ʿalī (Ali).

No name is more famous in the east than Solomon: he succeeded his father David, according to their belief, when only twelve years old; at which age, however, Omnipotence placed under his obedience, not only mankind and animals, but even the elements, and the Genii good and bad. His throne was magnificent beyond idea, 12000 seats of gold being arranged on the right for the patriarchs and prophets, and 12,000 on the left for men learned in every science. The birds were his constant attendants, screening him like a canopy from the inclemencies of the weather; whilst the zephyrs, wafting him wherever he wished to go, rendered horses or any earthly carriage unnecessary. — All the wonderful traditions, however, relative to Solomon, it must be observed, are not confined to the son of David. The heroic or fabulous ages of the Persians go far beyond those of the Europeans; the world, agreeably to their system, being peopled thousands of years before Adam, by ethereal or igneal beings, governed by a succession of seventy-two Solomons. The supernatural powers supposed to be vested in those antedamite monarchs, as well as in the king of Judah, are figured to have been chiefly derived from the curious talismans they were said to have possessed, (to which allusions are often made, not only in their poems and romances, but even in their graver works, and in the Alcoran itself), as the Khā'im, or Muḥri Sulimān, the seal of Solomon; the Tēghī ātish, or the flaming sword; the Jabah, or the impenetrable cuirass; and the Sapar, or the shield; which last, they add, was bequeathed by Jan ben Jan, one of the antedamite kings, to the father of mankind, who carried it to Serendib (Ceylon), where it was many ages afterwards discovered by Caiumaras, the first king of Persia; from whom descending to his grandson Thahmuras, it was by that prince employed to successfully in his wars with the Dives, that he got the surname of Div band, or chainer of demons. See دامبان, &c. These, it may be said, are Persian tales: but let us not ridicule them; they are dignified by the Homer of Persia, Ferdusi, in his Sulimān nāmāh, as the mythology of the ancients was rendered important by the Homer of Greece. Every age and every nation have their fooleries; many received opinions even of modern times will not bear the touchstone of truth; and the sorcery laws of our country are a far more authentic disgrace to human nature than all the wild yet pleasing fictions of the East.

of Kishtasp, (Darius Hystaspes); when it gave way to that of the Magi, then introduced by Zerdust or Zoroaster. (See مغ). They believed in one God, and in the ministry of angels, or inferior deities, as represented by the stars, which became in consequence high objects of their adoration. They held many tenets in common with the Mahometan, the Magian, the Jewish, and even the Christian religion, being by travellers called Christians of St. John, because they adopted a species of baptism. Their chief pilgrimages were to Haran in Mesopotamia, to Mecca, and to the pyramids of Egypt, which they supposed to be the tombs of Seth, and his sons Enoch and Sabi, whom they considered as the founders of their faith. This was the principal religion of the Arabians before Moslemism, and is one of those tolerated by the Alcoran on paying a certain tribute to the prophet and his successors.

▲ Sifūhān or I-fahūn, The metropolis of Gebel or Persian Irak (the ancient Parthia). It is said to have been founded above 800 years before the Christian era, and derives its name, as supposed, from Ispahan or Sepahān (cavalry), that being the principal station for the Persian armies, which, in all times, have consisted chiefly of horse. It was before the reign of Cyrus the capital of the Persian empire; but Persepolis, Susa, Madain (Ctesiphon), and other cities, having afterwards alternately shared that honour, it was not restored to its former dignity till the eleventh century of the Christian era, under the Seljukian dynasty. On the fall of that family, however, the dynasty of Mozafferiens (conquerors) attached themselves to Shiraz, which continued to be the seat of government till the elevation of the Sefi family in the sixteenth century, by whom, but particularly by Shah Abbas the Great (or the Cruel) Ispahan was rendered the most extensive and most magnificent city of Asia. صفاهاني, A native Isfahān, (or پرده صفاهاني), A species of melody, peculiar to Isfahan, much admired in Persia, of a simple pathetic style, and in some degree resembling the Scottish music.

Nadir Shah in 1736), so named from Ismael Safi, the first monarch of this house. The origin of the elevation of this family however must be traced to a private ancestor of that prince, called صفی الدین, (the purity of religion), who was cotemporary with Tamerlane. He resided at Ardebil, in Media; where his reputation for virtue was so high, that he was visited by that conqueror, as Diogenes was formerly by Alexander. Tamerlane on this occasion was so charmed with his conversation, that desiring him to ask any thing in his power to grant, the sage pointed to a number of young Carmanian captives, (whom this scourge of mankind according to custom meant to sacrifice on the first public festivity,) and requested their liberty: they were immediately delivered to him as slaves; but the generous philosopher furnishing them with every thing necessary, sent them free to their native country. As they were of the first families in Carmania, their sense of his benevolence found no bounds; they were constant in their attentions, and magnificent in their gifts; a respect little short of adoration was paid to him; and it was chiefly owing at length to the attachment and courage of the descendants of those grateful Carmanians that his posterity mounted the Persian throne.

 بیت الله الرحمن, The procession round the Kaʿbah or temple of Mecca, which the pilgrims are enjoined by the Alcoran to do seven times, the three first in a quick, the four last in a grave ordinary pace; it being also necessary, every time they pass the black stone which is set in silver at the south-east corner, about seven spans above the ground) either to kiss or touch it with the hand, which they immediately apply to their lips. It is supposed by the Mahometans to have been one of the stones of Paradise, and that it fell to the earth with Adam; but being again taken up at the deluge, it remained there till the angel Gabriel brought it to Abraham when he was building the Kaʿbah. It is said to have the property of swimming in water, and that it was originally as white as snow; though it has long since become superficially black, either in consequence of the touch of a menstruous woman, according to some doctors, or, as others imagine, by the kisses of the numberless pilgrims that have in all times flocked to Mecca. طواف کردن, To travel over, surround, encompass. z.

ف فريدون Farīdūn, The name of an ancient and celebrated king of Persia, the commencement of whose reign is placed about 750 years before the Christian era. His father (or grandfather) Gemshid, having been driven from his throne by an usurper, named Zohak, the people, after groaning under the oppression of this tyrant for several years flew at length to arms, under the conduct of a blacksmith of Isfahan, named Gao, who, marching at the head of the insurgents, with his apron displayed as a banner from the point of a spear, gave battle to Zohak, defeated and put him to death. After this important victory, Gao discovering the retreat of the young Feridun, placed him on the throne; in return for which, that prince gave him, as a feudal principality, Isfahan, with the surrounding districts (known afterwards by the name of Parthia, now Persian Irak). The blacksmith's apron became from that period the great standard of Persia, being from him named Dirafsh Gavani, (the banner of Gao). By Feridun and succeeding princes; it was richly ornamented with jewels, and lodged in the royal treasury; whence it was never carried to the field but when the king marched in person. It is said to have fallen at length into the hands of the Arabians, who found it among the other spoils of Yezdegird, the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, who was defeated by Saad, general to the khalif Omar, in the year 636 of our era. See سال. Farīdūn is the boast of the Persians, as a model of every virtue; but his reign is so much disguised by fable, that, without placing confidence in the facts, we must only consider them as objects of popular belief. Khondemir, an historian of character, and the Tarikh Gozideh, gravely give him a reign of above five hundred years, which alone justly renders much of the rest suspected. The same length of reign is assigned to this prince, in a book of Persian Cosmogony called Bohun Dehesh, written in the Pehlevi or old Persic, and asserted, by the Parsis of Guzerat, to be one of the works of Zoroastre; though part of it, at least, from allusions to particular events, must have been written since the seventh century of our era. Zoroastre is said to be one of his descendants.

▲ fūḥrah, A poor man. A religious order of mendicants thus named by the Arabians; by the Persians Darwēsh or Sof; and by the Indians (such as are of the Hindu religion) Yōgī, or Sannyāsī. In this singular class of men, who, in Hindostan, despise every species of clothing, there are a number of enthusiasts, but a far superior proportion of knaves; every vagabond of abilities, who has an aversion to labour, being received into a fraternity, which is regulated by laws of an uncommon and secret nature. The Hindoos view them with wonderful respect, not only on account of their sanctified reputation, but from a substantial dread of their power: the Fakeer pilgrimages consisting often of many thousands of naked saints, who exact wherever they pass a general tribute; and their character is too sacred for the civil power to take cognizance of their conduct. The men they treat with little regard to politeness; but to the ladies they behave with infinite gallantry; the course of their pilgrimage being in general marked by a decisive cure of all female sterility: the former therefore, for the most part abandon the villages on their approach; but the women, in seeming amazement at the terror of their male friends, undauntedly face this formidable host. The prayers of the Fakeers are then solicited with much eagerness, and they are too holy to deny comfort to their fair devotees: on these occasions however a slipper or a staff is always left as a signal at the door, which effectually convinces the husband, should any blunder unluckily direct him homeward, that his intrusion would be unpardonable, and subject him to a chastisement he seldom cares to hazard. It is astonishing, at the same time, what tremendous voluntary penances these people impose upon themselves, to gain a superior influence over the people: some suspend themselves by the shoulder-blades to iron hooks; some stand from the rising till the setting of the sun, like statues on their pedestals, exposed in that sultry climate to all the influence of his scorching rays; some clench their fists till the nails, piercing their palms, appear through the back; some load themselves with chains; some gash themselves with knives; some hold their arms constantly perpendicular; whilst others twist their heads till they look directly backward. Every invention, in a word, of perverted ingenuity is exhausted in distorting and deforming nature; some, of the most elevated enthusiasts, striking off even their own heads, on great solemnities, as a sacrifice to the Ganges, which they worship: if the nerves of the self-devoted victim are powerful enough to dismember it completely, he unquestionably goes to heaven; if not, his former sanctity is questioned, and his future happiness remains a doubt. The Fakeers and dervises in Arabia and Persia wear coarse woollen garments.

▲ fūḥrah, Broken or pained in the back. ▲ قاف Kāf, A fabulous mountain, anciently imagined by the Asiatics to surround the world, and to bind the horizon on all sides. In their writings, therefore, to paint the rising of the sun, they say, "When the star of day appeared from the height of Kāf, the world "was enlightened:" whilst they express the whole extent of the earth, by, "از قاف تا قاف, From Kāf to Kāf." To account for the first or false twilight (called الفجر الكاذب), which is followed by an intenser darkness immediately before dawn (named الفجر الثاني or الفجر الصادق, The second or true crepuscle), the Eastern astronomers supposed a window in Kāf, some degrees below the summit, through which the sun's rays being conveyed as he rose, the world after he had passed was left in temporary obscurity till he appeared again above the horizon. Since, however, some of their philosophers have applied themselves to the study of geography, they have discovered Kāf to be Mount Caucasus, or Imaus, to the east, and Mount Atlas to the west; over which the sun, in those countries, appears to pass when he rises and sets. In the Alcoran (for even Mahomet was carried along by this popular belief) Kāf is said to rest upon a stone, called Sakhrat, formed, according to some learned doctors, of one entire emerald, the reflection from which, they say, gives the azure appearance to the sky; whilst its movements produce earthquakes, volcanoes, and all the extraordinary phenomena of nature. On Kāf the Eastern poets and romances have fixed the residence of the Dives or Genii (supposing them to have been here confined by Tahmuras, and other ancient heroes of Persia): here too, they say, lies Fairy land; and here they place the city of Ahēman (the principle of evil), where Argenk, a Genie king, they add, built a splendid palace, in a gallery of which were portraits of the different kinds of rational beings who inhabited the globe before Adam. See اهرمان, سليمان, عنقه, ركايل بن ادم, پري, ديو, &c.

▲ qamar, The moon (especially from the 3d to the 26th day, the two first and two last days being called هلال). The old pastoral Arabians paid particular attention to the fixed stars, especially to those in the track of the moon's orbit, which they formed into 28 houses, dividing the zodiac into so many equal parts, through one of which they remarked the moon to pass every night. From a course of observations on those stars, and the angles they formed with the moon, in her various phases, the Arabians arrived early at a very great proficiency in foretelling the changes of the weather; whilst the regularity of their influence impressed them with such veneration for those stars, that they paid them a superior degree of adoration as subordinate deities. This, amongst other superstitions, was condemned by Mahomet. See صبا. The being white, somewhat white. Having the eyes blinded or contracted from the reflection of snow or any bright colour. کاغذ kāghiz and کاغد kāghid, Paper. A letter. کاغذ, Blotting paper. کاغذ خانه, A paper-mill. قمار, Playing cards. See قمار. امان کاغذی or دین کاغذی, A safe conduct. The Eastern nations are very curious in their paper, both in their books and in their letters; the most scrupulous etiquette being observed, when addressing great men, to send them precisely that sort of paper which custom has annexed to their rank. To the king, the ground upon which they write is gold; to subahs, and feudatory princes, it is generally ornamented with flowers of gold and other decorations; descending thus, through inferior ranks, with a variety of gradations, both in quality and size, till it becomes either quite plain, or is powdered slightly with gold dust. A great man may be flattered by sending him a paper superior to his dignity; but to err in the other extreme, is considered as an insult which he will not easily forgive. Kāghiz implies likewise a charter or patent, presented by the kings of Persia to those whom they mean to honour; by virtue of which, the governors of every district, through which a Kāghizdār travels, must supply him, the moment he presents it, with carriages and every necessary, to which his rank is intitled. کاغذ, Pasteboard. ع.
